About 4,000 oligochaetes were counted in 1 square meter of the bottom of the lake and about 9,000 in 1 square meter of meadow soil. In almost all oligochaetes, the head is a simple cone-shaped structure without sensory appendices. Light is detected by photoreceptor cells in the skin, usually concentrated towards the front of the animal. The mouth, located under the head, leads to a relatively simple and straight digestive tract consisting of a pharynx, a esophagus and a bowel, ending in an anal opening. The ground oligochaetes tunnel on the ground, swallowing the ground as they advance. The digestive tract of this worm is especially modified for this rough diet. It usually has a storage area of thin walls, or harvesting, and a muscle mass to grind the soil to remove the organic matter which is the real worm food. Specialized calciferous glands remove excess calcium, magnesium, strontium and phosphate and regulate the level of these ions in the blood. Solid waste is the largest and towed against the wall of the burrow, or expelled from the mouth of the burrow; The ejected material is called fused parts. The worms, through their excavation and digestive processes, are largely responsible for soil mixing and aeration. Not all oligochaetes have soil diets; Some of the small aquatic worms are active predators in other small invertebrates. Excretion is usually performed by a pair of pipes in each segment. The circulatory system is typical of the ringids and has many contractile vessels, or hearts. Although some aquatic forms have gills for breathing, most oligochaetes do not have such specialized structures and use the capillaries of the body walls for respiratory exchange. The dissolved oxygen in soil water diffuses through the epidermis of the worm. If worms are forced to the surface, as when their are full of rainwater, they suffocate as a result of desiccation. All oligochaetes are hermaphrodite and almost all fertilize by copula. Male and female reproductive organs are located in separate segments. The pair of sperm exchange caps, which are stored in the recipient's worm body until their eggs are ripe. The worm then secretes a cocoon in which it lays eggs and sperm; Fertilization and development of eggs occur in the cocoon. When young people emerge, they are miniatures of adults. The cocoon is secreted by a glandular region, the clitellum, composed of several thickened segments. The clitellum of a minhoeca is a conspicuous saddle-shaped region near its front end.
